We will not be stamped

Long before now, in past election years, we had made our position clear in the campaigns for governors of our state.

But this year, with only 26 days before election day, we find ourselves in a state of indecision.

In the past, for as long as we've been publishing this newspaper, there has been a Talmadge in the governor's race. We always cast our lot with an opposing candidate.

Today we are unhappy about the whole list of candidates. The man upon whom we could have stood firm did not qualify.

To us the entire campaign has snowballed into an affair completely beneath the dignity of the citizens of Georgia. And it is to their credit that election pundits find a large number of them with their minds still open and unmoved by the haranguing to which they are being subjected.

It does not take a very high degree of intelligence on the part of the electorate to realize the low level to which the candidates have dropped in the charges and counter charges they are making.

It does not take a smart voter to figure out that the promises of good things being made are impossible of being kept.

We're not mixed up. We're not merely postponing our taking a stand. We're not merely seeking to support a winner.

We want only the best for Georgia. Yet we feel that the choice we have to make leaves something to be desired in securing the best for our state.

And so we're not allowing ourselves to be stamped into a position by the hand-wagon technique. We're standing pat in the hope that the smoke of the campaign will clear away so that we might know where the truth lies.

We believe that the hope of Georgia lies in the hands of those who have not yet made up their minds—for we believe that they too are waiting for an opportunity to find where the truth lies that Georgia might have the best governor of those seeking that high office.

Statesboro naturally attracts youth

It has been "youth month" in Statesboro this month.

Last week more than 150 teenagers from twenty-five Georgia communities met here for a "Youth Workshop," sponsored by the Georgia Recreation Society of which our Max Lockwood is president. These young people, all youth leaders, came here to swap ideas on how to best provide fine, wholesome recreation for the youth in the various communities which they represent.

We watched them at one session, and we are convinced that the juvenile problem in Georgia is one which can be solved by the youth themselves in cooperation with their elders.

This weekend another group of young people from all Southeast Georgia will be here for a cheerleaders' clinic. These young people have as their objectives the promotion of clean sportsmanship on behalf of spectators at high school athletic events, and to develop a fine, healthy school spirit in the student bodies of Georgia high schools.

With our college here and the reputation which our young people have developed it is only natural that these youth meetings should be attracted to Statesboro.

We welcome them and wish them pleasant stays.

Every woods fire has a price tag

Watch your matches. Be careful with your picnic fire. Make sure of your cigarette.

Let there be no doubt in your mind about the death of your matches, your fire, your cigarette. For each can be dangerous if left alone. Each can bring ruin, disaster, and tragedy to our woodlands.

J. W. Roberts, Bulloch county forest ranger, advises us this week that the woodland areas of our county are "tinder dry."

With our woods in this condition in the midst of one of our driest summers in recent years the slightest spark or carelessly tossed match or cigarette can set off in seconds a woods fire which might take our forest protection unit hours to control.

Even more dangerous is the threat which comes from careless burning of brush and trash.

Mr. Roberts urges, he begs, all burning in or near wooded areas citizens planning brush or trash to first phone him at 501-L to see whether the fire danger rating for that day is low enough to allow safe burning.

There's a price tag on every woods fire that burns in Bulloch county. Regardless of where you live, who you are, or what you do, part of that price comes out of your pocket.

So watch it. Let's keep Bulloch county green.

Put on your best driving manners

If you get the feeling that someone is watching you while you are driving on our highways, you're probably right.

For a member of the Georgia State Patrol may be following you and making notes on how you drive, if you are observing all the traffic rules and if you are practicing common courtesy to your fellow highway travelers.

The deal is part of a special safety campaign, known as "Operation Courtesy." It is being conducted by the Georgia Citizens Council as the final phase of the "Slow Down and Live" program.

patrol stations will recommend two persons, a man and a woman, each week as Georgia's most courteous driver. At the end of this month all those who have been recommended will be considered by a special five-member board and that person selected as the most courteous driver in Georgia will receive a $100 Savings Bond and a jackpot of merchandise.

We suggest that all citizens of Bulloch county, including teenagers, put on their best driving manners, for one can never tell, the eyes of the State Patrol may be on you.

Methods of rearing children can backfire

By VIRGINIA RUSSELL

Parents may or may not have been helped by the psychologists and the extensive program of written matter, concerning the rearing of children.

Some of the methods that parents are taught to use do backfire and if you aren't that parent it can be funny. However, if you're the one who catches the backfire, well, it isn't a laughing matter.

On a few occasions it has been my happy privilege to enjoy watching the other parent try to wiggle out of his own teachings.

When the boys in this family were very young my Daddy told them that if they ever wanted to smoke to feel free to come ask him for a cigarette. He explained the dangers of fire and discussed the desert again, too. It happened that when time came for the first son to desire his smoke, it followed the desire of a large amount of wariness. But father and son sat down together and smoked.

The effect was very gratifying to the parent. The son lost his wariness and smoking desire at the same moment.

Sometimes later the second son felt the urge to smoke. It was after a heavy meal while we were sitting around the dining table. This son was five years old when he requested his cigarette. His daddy lit it up and told him to draw it in. The "young one" took a good draw, coughed and coughed, then left the room in a hurry. I looked at Pa and he winked at me with "The 'cured him' look on his face. The dining room door reopened and in came the boy and cigarette and in his hand was an ash tray. The mate's face fell down, down, down. I almost choked to keep from laughing out loud. Needless to say it took some moralizing and changing of tactics to impress this son.

The psychologists tell parents to introduce new foods to children with a happy look on their faces. Just the opposite can cause a dislike for a food to develop in a child; that may last all his life.

The father here has worked wonders in this line. (I must confess his look hasn't always been a happy one but most of the time he'd pass for a good psychologist.) I watched a little drama, a few years back that was pathetic. Some one sent us some turtle eggs. The Papa went into the most glowing details of a weekend he'd spent with a friend where they were eating turtle eggs. He described the wonderful taste exaggerating the delicacy of the dish. I know. All the time this story telling was going on he was cooking the eggs. The boys' mouths watered and they could hardly wait for the new-to-them dish. They started eating before their daddy sat down. Their countenance showed great unhappiness. Yet, they weren't willing to admit that their taste was at all pebbled, so down the eggs went.

Once their daddy sat down with his eggs he suddenly remembered he had to make an urgent telephone call, taking his delicacy with him. He whispered to me later that he thought the eggs would have hatched soon if they had been left undisturbed.

We was not so lucky this summer. For years he has raved almost sounding like a woman, about the wonderful taste of limburger cheese. One day, the son who found an ash tray for his cigarette in his early years, found his daddy some limburger cheese. He never known whether the son was calling his daddy's bluff or whether he believed his father. Anyhow, he came in in just a mad time and insisted on his daddy having some cheese he'd so longed for over the years. Two of the two indulged in this great rarity while the other children and I finished our meal in the living room. But from a distance I could see the son's face and hear him say, "Oh, daddy, it's fine after you get it in your mouth." I could see a pained but never say "die" look on "daddy's" face, as he tried to draw his own talkings.

It's great fun to watch the papa's teachings backfire, though it's most necessary to swallow your giggles.

When the boys in this family were very young my Daddy told them that if they ever wanted to smoke to feel free to come ask him for a cigarette. BUT DON'T BLAME US IF THE ALMANAC IS WRONG.

JIM HART has gone home. But he took a part of Statesboro, Bulloch county, Georgia, and the United States of America back with him.

You see, Jim's home is in England.

He was here in Statesboro for a year. He came here on an educational scholarship and while here he taught history in the Laboratory High School at the college. He made many friends while here—friends of his country and his country.

He is back home by now and he will spread his goodwill toward us among his people including the youth before whom he will stand and teach.

We got to know Jim right well. We found him a fine young man. Smart, friendly, a hard worker, and a wonderful ambassador of good will for his country.

Before he left he wrote us a letter which he sent published in the Statesboro Herald. Though addressed to us, he means it for you all.

Here it is:

"Dear Editor,
"On August 7, I am leaving Statesboro for Quebec, Canada, where I shall embark for England—home."

"I am naturally looking forward to seeing my family and friends, the sleepy villages, and the history-steeped buildings of my somewhat grimy hometown."

"Yet I shall leave Statesboro with a heavy heart, for I am leaving so much behind that is dear to me. Memories of the college faculty, pupils and friends, the sleepy villages, and the history-steeped buildings of my somewhat grimy hometown."

"The churches have a great influence on the life of our community. The continuance of this force for good will be assured so long as we maintain our attention to the spiritual needs of our boys and girls. We hope that our young people who go away to college and to work are well grounded in a faith which will sustain them. This is the real test of the effectiveness of our church youth work."

As the question ran through our mind, the minister read the Scripture which had to do with paying the price for what we select in life.

We wondered how the minister felt as he looked over the congregation of older folks with such a small group of youth. We did not wonder long when he stood up to report plans to take over some unused buildings to provide for the youth of the church and community. He had a wonderful plan, through which he envisioned hundreds of young people coming to church to study and worship. And the plan included provision for 400 at mid-week prayer service.

Sunday evening we went again to this church. Again the church was filled, and the sermon uplifting. This time there were about 50 young people and we noted efforts already begun to provide for their training.

The people of this church have their choice of the future.

Selective Service Board must know status of registrants

The Selective Service regulation stipulates that each local board is required to keep in mind the status of classified registrants and is required to keep current information on their local boards.

Failure to report as ordered results in his being reported for prosecution. Therefore, it is extremely important that the local board be promptly informed of change of address.

A great many individuals are in the military service and are required to register if they have served on active duty or if they are members of reserve components. All male citizens and certain aliens who were born on or after August 30, 1922, are required to register.

Inasmuch as a great many local boards in Georgia operate on a part-time basis, it is possible that an individual who reports for registration will find the local board office closed.

Failure to report as ordered results in his being reported for prosecution. Therefore, it is extremely important that the local board be promptly informed of change of address.

After all available means of locating registrants who have failed to keep their information of change of address, the local board is authorized to report a registrant as delinquent.

For example, a registrant who is classified in class 3-A as a father and ceases to maintain a bona fide family relationship with his child or children in his home should promptly report such a change in status to his local board. Failure to do so could result in his becoming a delinquent. The same results could follow when a registrant fails to notify his local board of a change in status. Failure to do so could result in his becoming a delinquent.

Accountants have no fear of 'Unavac,' electronic computer

EDITOR'S NOTE—If you're a bookkeeper or an accountant or an industrial engineer, or if you are just plain interested in "gadgets," you will like to read this piece written by W. C. Hurt Jr., director of public relations, Atlanta chapter of the National Association of Cost Accountants. It was written for us at the suggestion of Judson H. Lanier, Bulloch county, now making his home in Atlanta.

Accountants and industrial engineers are today concerned with the rapid pace being set by automatic computing equipment and automatic assembly machines. They have no fear that unemployment rolls will increase, but realize that a shifting of manual workers is inevitable. More and more employees will be reassigned from clerical positions to jobs far removed from their present position and some to more responsible clerical positions. Most of the American public get a glimpse of the "univac" electronic computer which is during the 1952 national elections when the intricate "brain" was predicting the voting results for television viewers. That particular machine has now been made obsolete by newer, more complicated, more efficient computing equipment.

Called "machines of the future," these electronic brains are now serving a real need in our economy; furnishing answers to complicated mathematical problems for research which formerly required most of scientists' time. One thin electronic tube about four inches in height can read a problem, compute equations, dictate the answer and store all the information for future use. Unlike the old-fashioned adding machines and manually operated calculators which were the latest thing for arithmetic, these electronic devices seem to actually think and appear to have a psychological temperament. Unlike the study of technology in the early thirties, when the men replaced by machinery were needed to build that machine, the field of electronics has opened up an entirely new level of production and living. One machine installation has in an instance replaced 96 to 100 clerks required to handle mail orders. The 96 employees thus released must be assigned to more productive activities. All of them are not needed, or qualified to build the one machine that replaced them in their jobs; nor can all be used in preparing information for the equipment or distributing the results.

Only a person with a vivid imagination can envision the combination of metal, plastic, and glass performing such tasks as reading instructions, executing orders, and typing a report of its activities. Some people are comforted with the idea that these mechanical geniuses are for the future, too expensive to affect the present generation; while others realize

Soil program helps farmers

Chase Smith of West Side, a cooperator with the Ogeechee River Soil Conservation District, is rendering a valuable service to the farmers in his community and county. He planted peanut bahia grass on a poor scrub oak ridge about 4 years ago and next year finished the acre around the ridge in coastal bermuda grass. The coastal bermuda grass is on better land than the bahia grass. They are both in the same pasture with no fence separating them.

This spring Mr. Smith fertilized the pasture with about 100 pounds nitrogen from liquid ammonia, going over the bermuda and bahia just alike with the same treatment. During the hot dry period we have had for the last month or so, the bahia grass stayed greener and more palatable than the bermuda grass. The cows grazed the bermuda down closer and left the bermuda which looked browner and tougher. This indicates that pensicola bahia will stand more drought than coastal bermuda; also that bahia is deeper rooted and more adapted to sandy droughty soils. It completely explodes the theory that cows don't like the bahia, and in fact, indicates that cows like it better than bermuda when treated alike.

It has also been rumored that bahia will scatter and take over all other pastures. This seems very thin when facts are examined. The coastal bermuda was planted a year later than the bahia—giving the bahia a head start, yet the bahia is still where it was originally planted and the bermuda where it was originally planted. On going over a majority of the coastal bermuda area about a dozen pounds per cow has increased from 4,600 pounds to 5,400 pounds in the last ten years. Meanwhile, consumption of milk per person has declined from 752 pounds to 680 pounds. One way dairymen can help meet the situation is to improve production efficiency. One way to do this is to cull the cow that culls your profit.

While feet are needed to get a person to a vehicle and hands are needed to build new labor-saving devices, less and less use is made of them for manual work. The wash board is available in only a small percentage of retail stores today. We have made every effort to

Bulloch County Farm Bureau

FB officers meet to plan for one-day 1954 membership drive

R. P. Mikell, county president of the Farm Bureau, met with all the community officers and other county officers Saturday afternoon to plan for renewing the 1954 membership. Mr. Mikell pointed out that the county that the date had been moved up at the request of the county officers and that Bulloch being on the north edge of the tobacco belt felt that the publicity given to the renewal would be of material aid here.

The 1954 membership cards have been printed and are ready. Most of the cards will be distributed at community meetings prior to August 19, but where the groups will meet after the one-day renewal day a call meeting will be held of the serving committee chairman and membership committees.

The declining farm income, the present legislative action indicated by Congress, and the continued high cost of living make it more imperative now than ever before to build a farm organization strong enough to have a voice in planning for farmers. Mr. Mikell stated to the group.

Middleground discussed the proposed "cross-compliance" features of the crop control program for next year. Miles Frank Deal, local ABC administrative officer, led the discussion. It will be necessary to stay within quotas on all crops to procure support prices on any of them next year, Mr. Deal pointed out.

that community and found the southern root rot as well as lesser corn borers and a few climbing cut worms giving lots of trouble.

One peanut field was left to about two-thirds of a stand by southern root rot. This disease is caused, Mr. Johnson stated, by litter on the ground not being turned as much as three inches deep before planting to peanuts. He also recommended that the rows be sprayed with some of the premerger sprays at planting time to avoid having to plow close to the peanuts and injure the vines.

As for the lesser corn borer, there does not seem to be any control program for it. Some have gotten fair to good control with insecticides that will stay on the plants a long time. This pest goes in the plants, peanuts, soybeans, and such like, just under the ground and cuts the stem off, virtually, and then eats the path of the stalk.

Around 1,000 4-H Club members are expected to register for the 21st annual Georgia 4-H Club Council meeting in Athens, August 9-12.

Keeping a box of baking soda near the stove is an important safety precaution. Sprinkling soda over the house is the safest way to put it out.

Georgia farmers cash receipts during the first five months of 1954 were $125,524,000 compared to $126,527,000 during the same period last year.

Southern root rot is killing lots of peanuts in the county, a report to the Ivanhoe group Friday night showed. J. R. Johnson and W. H. Gubley, agronomists from Athens, visited several peanut fields in
